How are personal research activities reflected in teaching activities?	My personal research activities in economic sociology are closely integrated into my teaching. Findings from my studies on economic behavior, social networks, and market institutions are incorporated as case studies, recommended readings, and discussion topics in relevant courses. I use current research data to update lecture materials, design student assignments that simulate real research processes, and supervise student projects related to economic sociology themes. This approach ensures that students not only gain theoretical knowledge but also develop analytical skills and understand how sociological research informs real-world economic and social issues.

How are personal research activities reflected in teaching activities?	My research activities allow me to deepen classroom discussions on sociopreneurship and community development by offering empirical insights drawn from the field. Through my engagement in Development Studies, I provide students with interdisciplinary perspectives that bridge theory and practice in addressing complex social issues. In particular, my active involvement in projects such as Sociovation (Sociological Innovation for Community Empowerment) and Socrates (Social Creativity and Entrepreneurship) enables me to integrate real-life cases into the classroom. These projects focus on nurturing sociopreneurial mindsets and community-based innovation, allowing students to engage critically with real development challenges and co-create transformative solutions.

How are personal research activities reflected in teaching activities?	My research activities directly enhance the substance and relevance of my teaching. By engaging in studies related to education, social inequality, cultural identity, and inclusive practices, I am able to introduce empirical cases and current debates into classroom discussions. These experiences allow me to present knowledge not just from textbooks, but also from lived realities and field data, fostering critical and contextual understanding. This integration ensures that students are exposed to up-to-date sociological perspectives that reflect actual societal dynamics.
