How are personal research activities reflected in teaching activities?	My research activities allow me to deepen classroom discussions on sociopreneurship and community development by offering empirical insights drawn from the field. Through my engagement in Development Studies, I provide students with interdisciplinary perspectives that bridge theory and practice in addressing complex social issues. In particular, my active involvement in projects such as Sociovation (Sociological Innovation for Community Empowerment) and Socrates (Social Creativity and Entrepreneurship) enables me to integrate real-life cases into the classroom. These projects focus on nurturing sociopreneurial mindsets and community-based innovation, allowing students to engage critically with real development challenges and co-create transformative solutions.

How are personal research activities reflected in teaching activities?	My personal research in cultural anthropology, folklore, and contemporary cultural studies is directly integrated into my teaching activities. Research on folklore and mythology enriches my courses on Cultural Anthropology and Folklore Studies by providing students with real case studies from Indonesian society. Investigations into gender, identity, and digital culture are incorporated into classroom discussions on Cultural Studies and Sociology of Culture, encouraging students to critically analyze contemporary social phenomena. Moreover, my work on cultural heritage and tourism development is utilized in teaching materials to demonstrate the applied relevance of anthropology in policy-making and community empowerment.

How are personal research activities reflected in teaching activities?	My research in the sociology of the body, gender studies, and Muslim women studies directly informs my teaching. I integrate current research findings and field data into class discussions, providing students with practical examples that go beyond theory. This approach ensures that students benefit from up-to-date knowledge and can relate sociological concepts to real-world issues.
